Nephrologists and nephropathy: on the relationship between nephrology and hypertension. The development of hypertension in chronic kidney disease has been a major focus of interest in nephrology research for more than 50 years. In this context, three major 'moments' have had a major impact on our thinking about nephropathies and hypertension. The first was the recognition that a true nephro-hypertensive syndrome is a key component of the clinical spectrum of renal diseases. This realization eventually led to the concept of 'the nephro-hypertensive nephropathy'. The second was the concept of the 'early nephro-hypertensive nephropathy', which was introduced in 1983 and led to the acceptance of the concept that the development of hypertension was a very important factor in the pathogenesis of renal disease. The third was the recognition that the age-related increase in blood pressure is a major contributor to the pathogenesis of renal disease, including the progressive decline in renal function associated with the aging process. This recognition has led to major advances in the treatment of hypertension. Unfortunately, there is still very little scientific knowledge about the causes of the major nephro-hypertensive nephropathies. Much of the research effort in the last 2d92ce491b
