But it's not the first time the idea has gotten some support from people higher up. In this excerpt from comedian Josh Gondelman's new book, The President is Allergic to You: Inside Trump's White House, senior White House advisor Stephen Miller and other staff members detail President Trump's odd history with the border wall, revealing that the White House initially wanted a fence that wouldn't work, but then Trump had them start working on a concrete wall anyway. No fence would do. Trump had ordered it on his first day in office. The problem was the General Services Administration, which, according to Miller, "had zero vision" and "lacked the ability to think strategically." "Within days of taking office," the GSA's contracting office had delivered a letter informing the White House that the agency couldn't execute the project the president had requested and needed a plan from the White House. "The [GSA's] first letter to the Trump administration was a joke," Miller says. "The White House on day one asked for $20 million to build a physical wall along the southern border. GSA said they couldn't do it." The GSA tried to figure out where to put the wall and concluded that a fence would be the most
