Food as Medicine for Children: Food as Nutrition Education. Researchers have identified that children who eat a diet rich in fruits and vegetables are better able to cope with stress and experience less pain and an overall happier and healthier life. Research has also found that children can learn about good nutrition and develop eating habits from their parents and caregivers. This article describes the rationale for incorporating food as medicine into nutrition education and offers information about specific nutrients that may help children to cope with stress, develop healthy eating habits, and grow into happy and healthy adults. Articles, books, and Web sites that provide information about ingredients in children's foods and information about foods that may help children with specific mental health issues are also described.
