I have a pipeline of executable programs that I want to run and to which I want to redirect the output from the final one. Is there a better way to do this than redirecting the output from the final program, e.g. stdout and stderr? It seems to me there should be, as in many cases the parent process will not read the output from the child process because it is redirected off. I was thinking something like this: $ python my_script.py | python my_script2.py > output.txt 2>&1 Is there a more succinct way to do this? A: If you're running a Python script, using Python's built-in subprocess.Popen object is a simple way to create child processes that write to standard output, error output, and return values: import subprocess p = subprocess.Popen(['some_command.py', 'some_arg'], 2d92ce491b
