Data recovery has become increasingly important as the digital revolution has spread to store, distribute, and consume vast quantities of data. Conventional approaches to data recovery are widely used, but they can be slow and/or unreliable. In conventional data recovery, a file system or other logic typically recognizes a single layer of directories and/or files on a storage device (e.g., a hard disk, memory card, or the like). The file system or logic can scan for and find any files in the single layer of directories or files. The data recovery system is then able to determine where the file is located in the storage device and access the file. A typical storage device can include multiple layers of directories and/or files. The multiple layers can include one or more layers of primary directories and/or primary files, one or more layers of secondary directories and/or secondary files, and one or more layers of tertiary directories and/or tertiary files. The data recovery system can attempt to find the file using the secondary directories and/or secondary files, then the tertiary directories and/or tertiary files, and then the primary directories and/or primary files. This can be a time consuming process, and it can also be a time consuming process to navigate to a particular directory and/or file on the storage device. Accordingly, there is a need for a data recovery system that can locate a file on a storage device quickly and reliably.Q: Do continuous working increase the probability that you reach a goal?
