Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a method and apparatus for storing and retrieving data on a database. More particularly, the present invention relates to a database on which data is stored in a relational manner and methods of operating the same. 2. Description of the Related Art Data processing applications often must interact with a database. A database provides a framework for organizing and storing data in a manner that permits quick and efficient access to the data. A database may provide a collection of data where each data object is logically related to other data objects. Data may be stored in different records that contain columns of data. The columns may include data that is logically related to one another. For example, a column in a database that contains an address of a business might logically relate to other columns that contain an address, street name, city, state, and zip code. The logical relationships among the columns determine how a query may be formulated to retrieve desired information from the database. Database technology has undergone several developments. In the early 1970's the Ingres database was developed. Ingres provided a network application programming interface (API) that is designed to allow application programs to communicate with Ingres to access and manipulate data. The Ingres database can scale to several terabytes. In the 1980's, relational database systems were developed. Relational databases are based on a model that was introduced by Codd and further developed by E. F. Codd. Relational databases use tables that have rows and columns. There are a variety of ways to create a relational database. The structure of a relational database is described in detail in the following books, which are hereby incorporated by reference: R. C. Grimm, Jr., The Relational Data Model: A Deep Dives into Relational Database Architecture, Morgan Kaufmann, 2000; and B. N. Karush and J. H. Konick, Designing Data-Intensive Applications, Prentice Hall, 1993
