Matt Bevin has proposed a bill that would require doctors to give their patients a written explanation when a medical professional says that a patient must rely on prayer. "We are allowing doctors to prescribe medications, to inject chemicals into the body, to use treatments that have not been approved," the Republican governor told reporters this week. "Yet we are not allowing physicians to tell patients, 'I do not wish to relieve your suffering, but if you are suffering, I would urge you to pray to the Lord for healing.' " Bevin is also considering a bill that would require abortion providers to give women medically accurate information. "Let's be clear: abortion is health care and it has been for many years," he said during the event at the National Religious Liberties Conference. "And so, why shouldn't pregnant women know that? Why shouldn't they know that their child is actually a person?... We've got to have a bill that, in addition to making abortion on demand harder to obtain, will make it harder for women to get the abortion procedure." But pro-abortion groups and Democrats say the governor's bills are an attack on women's health. Read MoreThe open source community is known for its openness and collaborative spirit. But new research suggests this haven for free culture has not protected us from the growing power of a few big software companies. After more than a decade of free and open source software (FOSS), is the open source community about to be made compliant with the global legal requirements of open source licenses? The licence is a legally binding set of copyright and patent rules for software, and the OSI -- the primary international organization that oversees open source licensing in the U.S. -- ensures that the maintainers of an open source project comply with the rules, known as the Open Source Definition. The reason is simple: Licence rules are incredibly useful for ensuring that large players like 3da54e8ca3
