

Reverse Engineering - Wikipedia A way of examining the Q: How to handle a very slow IO in a Django view? In a Django application I have to run a very long operation: for folder in Folders(cursor, limit) The Folders method returns ListQuerySet and cursor is initialized in a method using the cursor() syntax. The operation seems to be taking about 3 to 5 seconds to complete. Here's how the code looks like: def get_files_lists(self, cursor, limit): cursor.execute("SELECT DISTINCT MIME_TYPE FROM mytable") for folder in Folders(cursor, limit): cursor.execute("SELECT DISTINCT MIME_TYPE, UNIX_TIMESTAMP(FROM_UNIXTIME(FILE_CREATED)) \ FROM mytable,mytable_folder WHERE mytable.MIME_TYPE=mytable_folder.MIME_TYPE AND mytable.MIME_TYPE=" + folder.name + "";) How could I force Django to accept the query and not time out? Updates I tried using q__query__prepare().execute().fetchall() and it did not help. Fetching all the data is not an option since there are about 30M rows. A: You can use prefetch_related, here is the docs: It will preload related entities, but will do it only at first request. For you case, you can simply use __query__all() and it will preload all the entities and you will not get this error. Update: because you use cursor in my_view() function, you need to take care about the maximum depth of cursor. You should avoid using cursor in your view function and use fetch_or_404() method. You can look the implementation here:
