The main focus of the video is “break down the process of creating a new web application”. This is a great video! It’s a great introduction to Visual Studio 2013 and the great features that it brings. The Microsoft team really knows how to capture the essence of their products. It’s always great to see Visual Studio in action. Having said that, I don’t think the “break down the process” video is a very complete part of the launch videos and videos for future products. For example, I never really see any tutorials or case studies being done on the “new features” in Visual Studio 2013. There are some, but they are very few and far in-between. To me, the launch video is missing some parts that are essential in order to fully understand Visual Studio and Visual Studio 2013 and the new features that it brings. I think a very complete introduction to this version of Visual Studio would be a combination of this video with a tutorial/case study showing the new features. And that case study should have a good balance between the old features and the new features. For example, Scott has stated a few times on his blog that he thinks that the company should shift from a “It’s good enough” mentality towards a “It’s the best” mentality. Obviously the case studies would go a long way to help the company do this. There are many people that are expecting that Visual Studio 2013 will be fully equivalent to Visual Studio 2010. This video really doesn’t help to dispel that expectations. In my opinion, you should really use the launch videos as a tool for marketing. If it’s part of your strategy, then great! If not, then be ok. In the case of Visual Studio 2013, it is not the tool for everyone. Visual Studio 2013 is a big leap forward from Visual Studio 2010. It’s not a full replacement for Visual Studio 2010, and that should be made very clear! Summary The video is great. Keep in mind that this is a marketing video and it’s meant to capture the essence of Visual Studio 2013. It’s not 55cdc1ed1c
