Bringing Confidence to the People Who Need It Most One of the things I remember most vividly from my days teaching was having a difficult time understanding the idea that I needed to be a great teacher in order for my students to be successful. I thought it was enough to just have a good class, and that if I tried hard I could make the students learn the material. I was guilty of being intimidated by the complexity of the material I taught, and I worried about what my students thought of me if I had to explain things to them. I saw myself as a teacher, not as a facilitator. I wasn't sure how I would be perceived when I was teaching them things they didn't understand and expected me to make them understand. I don't think any of us can really understand the universal power of coaching until we understand what coaching really means. Many of us view coaching as something one person provides to another person, like a trainer. We imagine that it only involves helping people improve their skills. We don't think of it as a type of relationship between the people who are being coached. Coaching is a special relationship that exists between two people. It is the relationship that allows us to experience and learn something new in a way that only the two of us can. Why do we need a coach? Part of the power of the coach is that he or she is able to walk beside you while you are making the things you want to do. They are able to help you make the choices that will make you successful. They have the same goals as you do, and they provide the motivation that will help you to reach your goals. Because of that ability to motivate, coaches can lead you to a higher level of performance than you can. It's not just about helping people learn, but it is about helping people develop their own mental, physical, and emotional abilities. When we view our coaching clients in this light, it can help us realize the value of
