The recent outbreak of the human coronavirus (HCoV) (SARS-CoV) and the recent identification of an epidemic coronavirus of feline origin (FIP) in cats and not, in principle, in their owners, has re-aroused the interest in mammalian coronaviruses as a possible cause of morbidity and mortality in human beings. This interest is reinforced by the growing evidence that respiratory tract infections caused by the human coronavirus OC43 or by the murine coronavirus MHV are the origin of exacerbations of chronic obstructive pulmonary disease (COPD). An animal coronavirus (TGE) was found to cause severe enteritis and diarrhea in young suckling mice. Several case reports of a new coronavirus of swine which causes pneumonia in young pigs have recently been published. Among human coronaviruses, the human coronavirus 229E and the recently identified human coronavirus NL63 cause common colds. Human coronavirus 2229E, however, has also been associated with the development of bronchitis and pneumonia in patients with chronic obstructive pulmonary disease. Coronavirus infections of livestock have caused tremendous losses in both livestock industry and human health. The porcine coronavirus causes a disease characterized by respiratory tract involvement and nephritis. This disease has also been called porcine respiratory coronavirus (PRCoV). In addition, the mouse hepatitis virus of the genus alphacoronavirus is a common etiologic agent of the “acute hepatitis” of mice and ferrets. Infection of mice by MHV is asymptomatic or may result in a short acute and self-limiting illness. However, when inoculated into susceptible adult mice, MHV is associated with a lifelong persistent infection. MHV belongs to the family Coronaviridae and is related to the genus alphacoronavirus of enveloped positive-stranded RNA viruses. Other coronaviruses that have been reported in mammals 1cb139a0ed
