Download.The invention relates to an arrangement for adapting an exhaust gas recirculation system to an exhaust gas recirculation manifold, in particular to a W-TECH exhaust gas recirculation system to a manifold in a multi-cylinder internal combustion engine. An exhaust gas recirculation system for an internal combustion engine is used to reduce the formation of harmful emissions and also for reducing the consumption of the engine. In order to achieve this, the recirculated exhaust gas is mixed with the intake air and this mixture is then fed back to the combustion chamber of the engine. The exhaust gas recirculation system comprises a conduit for recirculating the exhaust gas to the intake system. At the end of the conduit, an adapter arrangement is provided for connecting the exhaust gas recirculation conduit to the engine manifold. A large number of different types of known adaptors exist for the connection between the exhaust gas recirculation conduit and the manifold. Some of these adapters are flange-type connections or plug-type connections, others have a corrugated design. These adapters have the disadvantage that they have to be mounted individually on the exhaust gas recirculation conduit and on the manifold. This is time-consuming and expensive, which becomes all the more so when two exhaust gas recirculation conduits are connected to a manifold. It is an object of the present invention to provide an adaptor arrangement that eliminates these disadvantages. The object of the invention is achieved with an arrangement in accordance with the characterising portion of claim 1. The exhaust gas recirculation system according to the invention is characterized in that the adapter comprises a first flange-type connector and a second flange-type connector, each of which is adapted to be connected to one of the exhaust gas recirculation conduit and the manifold, wherein the first connector and the second connector are connected to one another by means of a pipe-shaped connecting member that extends transversely to the adapter and has two ends, one end of the pipe-shaped connecting member being connected to the first connector and the second end being connected to
