You must have at least the Photoshop CS4 Essentials and Photoshop CS5 Essential Studio programs if you are to edit images. Some of the more advanced features in these programs come from the Photoshop CS6 InDesign plugin. I present and use many methods of manipulating images in this book; however, Photoshop offers many other options. You can also use any of the image manipulation programs: GIMP, PhotoPlus, and Paint Shop Pro, among others. Mastering Photoshop Photoshop is a program that's easily mastered, but you should understand a few things about it before you jump in. The following sections go over how to open and use the program. Importing an image The first things you do when opening Photoshop are to open the image that you want to make an image of and to select an option. Depending on the image type, some of these options may not be available. One of the major differences between using the free version and the paid version of Photoshop is the benefit of the interface. The free version is fine as long as you're not looking for professional features like advanced color and image editing or text editing. Choose File⇒Open. The Open dialog box appears, as shown in Figure 1-1, and presents the options that appear here. Note that depending on the image type, you may not have the Add From Files option. If you don't see that option, you can start an image project by choosing File⇒New. You can read more about the New dialog box in Chapter 2, Figure 1-1; You can import an image from almost any location on your computer. The most basic way to import an image is to choose it from the Open dialog box. You can do this by simply selecting it directly from your hard drive or by choosing to open it from a file. If you want to import an image from another source, you can do so by choosing From Files. On the left side of the dialog box, you see a list of common source locations. Click to open an image and import it into Photoshop. You also can import images from photos, scanned images, scanned maps, Web images, and more by using the Import Image command. Follow these steps: 1. Choose Image⇒Open or press Ctrl+I (Windows) or Command+I (Mac) to open the Import Image dialog box. 2. Choose File type from the left side

BRAF and NRAS mutations in malignant melanoma of the mucosal surface of the oral cavity and the lining of the lips. Mucosal melanomas are rare, and when they occur, they are thought to be more aggressive than cutaneous melanomas. NRAS and B-RAF mutations have been identified in the majority of cutaneous melanomas, but the significance of these mutations in mucosal melanomas remains unknown. We analyzed the presence of NRAS and B-RAF mutations in 23 mucosal melanomas of the oral cavity and lining of the lips. The presence of mutation in the BRAF gene correlated with a better outcome in both locations. The location of a melanoma is a determinant of the prognosis of the disease. Our results suggest that patients with mucosal melanomas of the oral cavity should be carefully monitored and treated with a BRAF inhibitor if a mutation is detected. Analysis of small RNAs in giardia duodenalis. Giardia duodenalis is a complex parasite that contains two extremely different cell types: highly encysted cysts and motile trophozoites. Motile trophozoites are the initiating stage in the life cycle of G. duodenalis, which follow the highly regulated differentiation process of the encysting parasites. In this article, we analyze the small RNA (sRNA) populations generated from the G. duodenalis trophozoites and encysting parasites by using an sRNA-enrichment protocol developed by Dr. Peter Czajkowski's laboratory in the USA. sRNAs in G. duodenalis were also compared with the small RNA populations of other protozoan parasites, such as Trypanosoma cruzi, Plasmodium spp. and Entamoeba histolytica. The sRNAs in the G. duodenalis trophozoites showed a limited similarity to those in Trypanosoma, Plasmodium or Entamoeba. Two sRNA families, 21- to 25-nt RNAs, and 24- to 28-nt RNAs, were identified in G. duodenalis, as previously observed in other parasites. The comparative analysis of sRNAs from various stages of the G. duodenalis life cycle will provide greater insight into the molecular mechanisms and developmental pathway of this parasite. Linear polarization-preserving energy-recovering nonlinear optical filters. Linear polarization-preserving nonlinear optical (NLO) filters are presented. These filters are designed based on the Dyakonov-Perel's and Littman's theories for nonlinear media of parallel and perpendicular crystals, respectively. The parameters for the nonlinear optical crystals are obtained by solving the eigenvalue problem with the six-wave mixing model. Results show that the designed NLO filters could recover the polarization states of the input wave that is lost by the nonlinear conversion, as in the conventional nonlinear filters. The design is based on the energy conserving principle. SAS® Proc IMPEXP Statistics for increasing variable compliance Abstract This article addresses the question of whether the observed utilization of healthcare resources (e.g. elective surgery and services) can be used as an alternative indicator for verifying compliance with conditions that determine whether certain services are provided. In support of this, data from the Swedish Register on Social Services and Allocation of Resources (REK) are used. After first describing the data, three approaches to assessing whether the observed utilization of healthcare resources can be used as an alternative indicator for compliance with conditions that determine whether certain services are provided are considered. The results show that a combination of conditions – such as older people with a long-standing disease – may be more reliable than the more strict criteria as a single condition. 1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a reaction device for separating a suspension of a solid into a portion of particulate material and a gaseous phase in a continuous manner. The reaction device according to the present invention may be used, for example, in the production of superconductor materials. 2. Description of the Prior Art The major problem in separation of superconducting particles such as YBa.sub.2Cu.sub.3O.sub.7-x from metals, which form the container or reactor used for the production, from the gaseous phase is the difficulty in achieving high separation yield while maintaining adequate separation efficiency. In conventional process it is necessary to use separation apparatuses, such as cyclones, hydrocyclones, and filter apparatuses, because these solid powders are very difficult to separate by other mechanical means and the only currently available separation means are those utilizing the difference in the specific gravity and viscosity. However, these separation apparatuses are complicated and must be
