Nike introduced a "Motion Trainer" that uses an Android-based tablet to use your body to play and practice football, using "HyperMotion Technology" from FIFA 22, which collects the data from your body using accelerometers and gyros. Nike's application features a "Dynamic Tackling System" and uses the data collected from the player's body to power an augmented reality "Movement Trainer," which appears on the viewfinder in-game in real time. In 2014, Samsung released a FIFA 17 smartphone. It used data from the player's body to collect the information, such as sensors in the player's shoe. However, there are many other ways of collecting data, such as using the player's face to register his reactions, using a microphone, or using data from the ball, rather than the player. There are even inventions like the Mater ball, which has sensors and AI built in. And with user generated content being such a staple of modern football, there are countless ways to collect information. Teams on FIFA Ultimate Team and other mobile games collect and analyse data about player activity, including GK-Curry, GK-Velo and GK-Close Touches. Players are finding other ways to gain competitive advantages. At the end of August 2018, Kenyan player Benjamin Lusabui scored a goal in a match for his club team, Canon Lianja in the Kenyan Premier League by kicking a ball into the roof of the pitch, allowing the ball to hang from the net after contact with the goal post. This contraption is called the "Ball on a Stick" and looks like this: A player and his club team called a costumier to make such an item. These items are used by many real football players. Some shirts have such a device. How is the information used? When "Motion Capture" and "Data Gathering" have been used in play before, data is usually used for things such as "AI" and "Fitness" in FIFA, and on the real world, it is used for things such as:

- Training a computer to predict the next pass or tackle
- Fitness tracking to develop sport-specific training programs
- Real-time player monitoring for adapting the player's reactions to the opponent's play and for real-time goal-scoring

Players are finding other ways to gain competitive advantages. How does the information affect my player
