Opponents of the proposed Keystone XL pipeline will welcome President Barack Obama's speech today in which he plans to outline his new strategy for "substantial reductions in carbon emissions" by 2025. If all goes according to plan, his announcement will be his most important message to date on climate change, a subject he's already taken more than 20 years to address. The new strategy won't be as good for the climate as a Keystone XL pipeline, but it's better than doing nothing. He says it's a step toward serious climate action There is no doubt, however, that Obama is being pressured by environmentalists to make good on his long-awaited promise. Back in 2007, then-Vice President Dick Cheney even went so far as to say he would be "pleased" if the proposed pipeline became reality, suggesting that the president should just "declare it dead" instead of finding ways to prevent it. (Thankfully, that didn't happen.) Cheney's comments weren't an endorsement of the Keystone XL or any other specific pipeline, and, as we know from recent events, he and the rest of the oil and gas industry weren't completely opposed to energy efficiency, either. But Obama's new plan is more than just a political victory for environmentalists. It represents a sea change for the president's climate policy. It's a sign of how much damage the Keystone XL has done. The new strategy is a death knell for Keystone XL The oil and gas industry will not be happy with the president's new commitment. Not only will it not be easy for President Obama to fulfill that commitment (which, to be clear, is a laudable effort), but it represents a death knell for Keystone XL. In his climate plan, the president is announcing his intention to move forward with an "all of the above" energy strategy. And as he's said before, all of the above includes Keystone XL. The new strategy favors renewables and natural gas over fossil fuels If you look 648931e174
