What's New In?

Tuesday, February 11, 2010 On one of my recent trips to Wild Oats, the owner of this wonderful nursery introduced me to some of his favorite flowers. I've always thought that most nursery plants were bred to be sold, but after seeing their selection of alpine and hardy perennials, herbs and vines, weeding and mulching ideas, grasses, shrubs and trees I thought they were bred to be gardeners! I have some of the same favorites, but after learning so much from the owner and viewing his "seasonal planting", I thought I'd share some of them with you. I love the hanging baskets, but I've seen so many ideas for them, it's hard to know which is best! This is an example of a fabulous one in California. I'm partial to the Chinese wax plant. I love the look of its spidery blooms, and you don't have to water it much. I love the color of its foliage, and it looks so good with some of the more colorful blooms. I'm also fond of some of the better labeled plants that I think my husband would appreciate. I think some of these are beautiful, but don't necessarily need names attached to them! I like the occasional Asian influence in my garden, and I love the way these Asian bulbs add color in the spring. This is a favorite! The white flowers are edible, and a great addition to a spring garden. I like the idea that this is one of the easiest edibles to grow, and the flowers look good for a long time. I really love the alpine violets in this example of a wild plant being cultivated. I think you need to set aside space for wildflowers in your own garden, especially if you live near a forest. They add color and fill empty space when other plants are not blooming. This isn't a plant I can grow, but the blooms have made it from where it grows naturally into something pretty. I like the idea that it would make a good accent! We recently found a wonderful purple coneflower growing in our own garden. It had been there for years, and we never knew it was edible. It looks like another a favorite for the owner, but I have also seen all different colors of blooms! I think these are some of my favorite of the show and would include in a list of favorites for me. I
