He doesn't get much of a chance to speak, though, as the movie quickly shifts to Ice Cube as he marches his crew up the mountain to confront a group of soldiers he believes are responsible for the death of Da Lench Mob's last leader. One of the things I love about Guerillas in tha Mist is the way it never forgets just how ragged the Lench Mob's clothing and appearance are, as opposed to a well-heeled crew that would traditionally get a "babies" nickname. Ice Cube is portrayed by the typical Ice Cube wraith (minus The Big Cube himself, because let's face it, that dude is dead), and the rest of the crew are as they usually are, but the effect is worth it, and Ice Cube is at least able to get some lines in in the middle of a conversation. It helps that we still see him as one of the kings of the post-Boyz n the Hood hip-hop generation, leading with his back and always ready to save the day. In the end, Ice Cube gives his final soliloquy, declaring that he's going to save the Lench Mob and many others from the same fate that befell his crew, and then he marches off into the jungle. The movie was, in part, a response to the limitations of the R&B genre on the big screen, as movies like Boyz n the Hood and Blank Man focused so heavily on the gangsta rap street life. I'm not surprised, then, that Guerillas in tha Mist is largely a return to form for Cube. It may not be as bombastic as his early albums, but it's still a righteous hardcore track that's worth a watch, and one that we will continue to use as a benchmark for good ghetto-inspired rap music.
