jquery is a great javascript library. it gives loads of features. one feature we use is the event delegation. jquery uses delegation to attach all events a specific node automatically. so for example if you put the button in your page, and inside the button you put the trigger for the click or submit event, all this will trigger. you can also pass more parameters to the event handler. for example the cake shop 3.3 version allows you to cancel the event if there are multiple events and then we need to check for the one that was created by the event on the cake. but why would you want to do this. think of a form that has some code that makes the form go at the top of the page. this form may have lots of fields, and when you click next / previous it will be a pain to find out if you clicked next or the wrong one. it does not create a submit handler. i have to add a submit handler on each button in the page to make the form go to the bottom. and why would i want to do this. because with jquery you can attach events on all elements in the page and have them all trigger the same way. its great. but the cake logic is at the top of the page. so the form doesnt submit until the last button is clicked. this means that when you cancel the submit the form still submits and then stops it. second, do any ycers have time to fill me in on what they're doing in the valley? i have 2 friends i want to get in touch with who have no connections in the valley. i'm thinking that it may be harder than i had imagined for my friends to find places to live, jobs, and companies that fit their skill sets. ===== bmelton > _ " i'm thinking that it may be harder than i had imagined for my friends to > find places to live, jobs, and companies that fit their skill sets." _ i am extremely biased, but you could look at the companies that aren't in the bay. they tend to operate in the same thing we do, but generally outside the ideal. generally, i wouldn't recommend any of them to anyone, unless it's for the novelty of it, as many of them end up being poor choices. i'm hoping to work at adio or sphero, but for the record, i'd prefer not to be involved with either. anyways, the valley is essentially a small town, not the largest city in the world. companies are built on people and relationships. you'll find the best jobs at the companies that have a really good culture. i've found that the best way to get a job is to find a person you like and then pitch to that person. show them your personality and how much you want the job. if that person likes you, they'll try to convince other people to hire you, but not if they don't care about you or your personality. the last place you want to be is a position without a culture. my girlfriend's brother is a vp at a pretty large company that has lost its culture. they put on a show for outsiders and employees, and they give everyone awards. it's kind of sad, because he once was really passionate about the company, and now it's just 'work.' --- greenyoda how can you recommend any of these companies to friends? --- bmelton most of my friends don't consider hardware companies to be a thing anymore, so if i ask them what the tech industry is like, i'm trying to show that to them. 5ec8ef588b
