sketches are added by snapping the top and left corners of the window. you can adjust the size of the window by grabbing the corners and dragging them to resize them, or use the scroll wheel on your mouse to zoom in or out. coremedia is used to produce high quality screenshots, though it takes an unusual way to do so. instead of saving the screenshot as a file on your desktop or in your pictures folder, coremedia saves the screenshot to coremedia 's online photo library. this may be a result of picking the "standard" settings, but i found the default format to be unnecessarily low-resolution. higher resolutions, say at a maximum of 400, allow for cleaner, crisper lines, and more importantly, can be scaled down to use as tiny, skype-style icons on your desktop if you want. the cargo hold is divided into four rows and offers up space for four stick loads. you can configure the planemap to be as detailed as you like. in the default configuration, i got extra depth for all the flights i'm taking. i found the planemap controls a tad finicky, and it doesn't seem to be working all that well. the map can warp and you get the basic visual effect of the "warp dream" modes, which is a bit nice, but the masking just isn't all that fine. switching modes didn't seem to have any effect, and it always seemed to take a bit of time to get where i wanted. i also tried using the p3d planemap warping tool, which is supposed to be more efficient, but it didn't work for me either. perhaps i just need to learn how to use it properly. maybe somebody else out there can help me. i'm still saving up for the c-51.
